when they were young, lara rainbow SkyTrain Japanese pillows and a coffee cup in her ring By Jamie Baum & Simon MurphyPosted: June 24, 2011 Amour As we become more of a global city, it's important that we find ways to engage in cultural dialogue that is not primarily motivated by commerce and consumption. Our global cities must also be bold and visionary. Let's start this week's Inspirational Life by looking at an inspiring human being named Carlos Amour. Do you know who this is? Well, he's the victim of a gun crime in Vancouver (on June 13). As CBC News reported: "Carlos Amour had already moved to Vancouver from the Caribbean and was an experienced home buyer. He found a listing for a home for sale in Kitsilano and drove the four blocks to check it out." The newspaper described him as "a retired Air Canada employee who had left his family in Antigua." (That's more like it!) But, he was a resident, not a tourist. And he had paid his taxes. And it was the wrong house. He was just about to make an offer when a gun-wielding thug burst into the house. He demanded that the victim hand over the keys to his vehicle. He then shot Carlos and three others. So, I had this to say: If only the person who would shoot an innocent man would be willing to take a bullet from someone who clearly knows how to defend himself. And here's the good news: The crime did not stop Amour. He went back to the house, and confronted the robber, who left the house. Amour's friend, Lacey Mitchell, then stood guard outside the house with a loaded gun while Amour went inside to fetch his own gun. To the police, it was clear that the perpetrator was the least-likely suspect. It was not a drug-dealing, gang-banger-for-hire. It was an innocent young black man who had moved to Vancouver from another country and was now being shot down in cold blood. But, this meant that they needed a "persuader" to arrest him. Police officers needed a convincing "tip" that he was guilty, and that the information 82157476af
